SUMMARY OF RESEARCH INTERESTS

My research and teaching focus on China's foreign relations, the international relations of East Asia, and international security, specifically on the extent to which the conventional narrative of power politics accounts for cooperation and conflict in historical and contemporary Asia. My scholarship draws on empirical, mixed methods to analyze China's interactions with its peers, examining how countries with disparate capacities in the region develop the requisite norms, consensus, and institutional mechanisms to achieve security. My aim is to expand the horizons of empirical research in international relations and area studies, providing insights to an audience within and beyond academia interested in Asia and international politics.

Specialization: international relations; foreign policy; China; East/Southeast Asian security and politics
